In the not too distant past, most men had a sense of certainty that they could fulfill those roles. They were confident about who they were, and where they belonged. But for many men the economic crisis that began in 2008 meant that fulfilling those masculine roles was suddenly a lot harder. Mens roles are in a profound state of flux, as the worst recession since the 1930s destroys millions of male jobs. Men are facing an uncertain future and a stark choice: adapt or perish.
